More of education project released

Tuesday, June 22, 2010

The Riley Institute at Furman University has released another portion of its online information resource, WhatWorksSC.

The new section, "Improving Learning in the Early Years," includes a report co-authored by John Hester of Francis Marion University's Richardson Center for the Child and Delores Stegelin of Clemson University; a case study of the Clemson-Barnwell First Steps Project; and a clearinghouse of other early childhood education initiatives.

For more information

Riley Institute's WhatWorksSC

Other topics, including "Successful Dropout Prevention Strategies" and "Building Strong School Leadership," will be added in coming months.

WhatWorksSC was unveiled in April, and it grew out of a 2007 Riley Institute study that identified what South Carolina residents want and expect in public education.

The goal of WhatWorksSC is to help translate those research findings into practice.

Go to postandcourier.com to click through to the Riley Institute's WhatWorksSC clearinghouse.

Copyright © 1995 - 2010 Evening Post Publishing Co.