Michelle Horhota is an Associate Professor in the Psychology Department and the Associate Dean for Mentoring and Advising at Furman University. She earned her Ph.D. in Experimental Psychology, with a specialty in Cognitive Aging, from the Georgia Institute of Technology in 2008. Her undergraduate degree in Psychology was completed at the University of Toronto. She has been an active researcher in her field, publishing over 20 journal articles and chapters and presenting over 40 conference papers in the area of social cognition and aging. Her current research focuses on ageism and the role of beliefs and stereotypes on older adults’ memory performance. She teaches General Psychology and courses related to Adulthood and Aging at Furman. She also teaches a course on preserving one’s memory abilities in the OLLI program.

C. Danielle Vinson is a Professor of Politics and International Affairs at Furman University. After completing her PhD in political science at Duke University, she joined the faculty at Furman in 1995 and served as the Chair of the Political Science Department 2009-2015. Her teaching and research interests focus on institutions in American government with a particular emphasis on Congress and the media. She teaches courses on Congress, the Presidency, Media and Politics, and American Government and regularly directs the Department’s Washington internship program. She is the author of the book Local Media Coverage of Congress and Its Members and has written articles and chapters on Congress and the media, political parties and the media, religion and politics in the media, and communication and spending in political campaigns. She recently completed a book called Congress and the Media: Beyond Institutional Power that focuses on how Congress has used media to influence policymaking over the last 30 years. She won the university’s Meritorious Advising Award in 2001. As a native South Carolinian, she is often called upon by local, national, and even international press, especially during presidential primaries, to make sense of South Carolina politics (not quite as impossible as it sounds).
